- Oregon (460 miles / 740 kilometers)
- Washington (510 miles / 820 kilometers)

A Journey of Epic Proportions

Embarking on the PCT is not for the faint of heart. It is a physically and mentally demanding undertaking that requires meticulous planning, endurance, and a deep appreciation for nature's challenges.

Most hikers attempt the trail in its entirety during a five- to six-month period, typically starting in late April or early May and aiming to finish before the first snowfall. The trail passes through diverse ecosystems, including high alpine passes, dense forests, arid deserts, and majestic mountains. Hikers encounter elevation changes of thousands of feet, a variety of weather conditions, and varying degrees of water availability.

Iconic Landmarks and Unforgettable Encounters

Along the way, the PCT offers a tapestry of unforgettable experiences and iconic landmarks. Hikers traverse granite peaks and glaciers in Yosemite National Park, cross the windswept Mojave Desert, and witness the ancient lava flows of Crater Lake National Park.

The trail is also home to diverse wildlife, including black bears, mountain lions, coyotes, deer, and countless bird species. Encounters with these creatures can add to the thrill and wonder of the journey.
